The News' Katarina Nash and Jim Ward discuss the NZ government's budget announcement and the prospects for the dairy sector. PANELIST: Katarina Nash Katarina Nash, sub-editor at The Spinoff, has been working in journalism since 2007. She has worked in radio, online and print news, and has also done freelance copy editing. She began her career at the New Zealand Herald, where she spent three years writing features. She has also worked as a producer at Radio New Zealand and was a producer at Nine to Noon. She has a Bachelors Degree in journalism from Otago Polytechnic. JIM WARD: Have the dairy sector's biggest supporters – the Greens, the Maori Party and NZ First – been disappointed by the budget? Katarina Nash: With the dairy industry starting to get the attention it deserves for its potential contribution to the New Zealand economy, there's been some real concern about the Government's approach to the issue. It was assumed the Government would support dairy farmers on a case-by-case basis, and even – despite several announcements to the contrary – grant them a tax credit of between $2000 and $3000 for each cow they own. But they didn't, and that was a very big surprise. What people want to see is that Government support intensifies, and fast, but it's likely to be a long time coming. The best way the dairy industry can get people's attention now is by demonstrating they're doing what is needed to make money, and to keep it coming in, but that will take time. There are also huge concerns about the feasibility of the dairy free-trade agreement with Australia, and it's going to be very hard to revive that particular initiative.
